Marilyn Raybin, President of Marvell Foods, says: "Marvell Foods has been working since last August with many of the USDA awardees who have won bids from the USDA to supply food to distributors who in turn supply food to the food banks, we are proud to play a significant role in helping to not only keep manufacturing plants and suppliers busy and factories working during the stresses of Covid and many worker layoffs, while at the same time, also serving as a source to supply food to American's in need, who are suffering from food insecurity, across the country."

As a major subcontractor and distributor of proteins and food products to the USDA commodities distribution program, Marvell Foods is a multi-generational, woman-owned business with operations across the country. Marvell Foods quickly jumped into action, vigorously joining the effort to address the growing challenges of Food Insecurity across the nation by supplying food distributors with the products they need to fill the gaps facing food banks. In America, the number of people facing food insecurity in 2020 was estimated to rise above 50 million, including 17 million children.
